II.2.4) Description of the procurement

This is an important part of the passive fire protection for a building and is the process of filling any perforations or voids in its existing compartmentation with fire rated materials in order to prevent fire, smoke and heat passing through building compartments. These compartments are designed to restrict both horizontal and vertical fire spread.

Fire stopping these can vary from minor works such as filling linear gaps with intumescent mastic, and around service penetrations to larger works such as filling voids or large breaches in compartment walls with a material like mineral fibre. This can also include the creation of new large fire resistant barriers in open loft spaces.

For all fire stopping works, it is important that suitable products offering the equivalent fire protection are used.
