Description

Introduction - Fitness to Practise

As part of our duty to protect the public, if a social worker falls seriously short of the standards expected of them, we can either remove them from the register or restrict what they can do professionally. These powers, given to us by Parliament, cover all registered social workers across both child, family and adult social care.

A social workers' fitness to practise may be found impaired for a number of reasons, including but not limited to:

Conduct

- Competence
- Health
- Caution, Conviction or determination by another regulator
- Not having the necessary knowledge of English

When a service user, member of the public, employers or other public body has a concern about the standard of a social worker's practise, they can raise this with Social Work England.

We will undertake to investigate serious matters which may pose a risk to public protection or public confidence in the profession and take action to restrict a social worker's practice in circumstances where it is necessary to do so.

The successful Bidder/s will prepare cases for a fitness to practise hearings or meetings and to present cases before Social Work England's adjudicators.
